objection to the plaintiff having no bill of particulars.

This objection, it will be remembered, was overruled by the Court, when a bill of exception was taken but subsequently withdrawn. Now, in order that no exception can be taken, Mr. Black states that he intends to file a petition for the above amount of money under the law of Common Accounts, which makes any contract or labor payable as soon as performed, or at such time when said contract or labor is agreed to be paid. The Worthington Law in this suit, Mr. Black claims, will not hold good, because the contract and labor performed by Mr. Birmingham was ordered by Mr. Corbett when there was money in the treasury.

The Worthington Law says that no contract or work shall be ordered unless there is money in the treasury. On this ground Mr. Black proposes to show that when his olient's contract was issued and the labor performed there was money in the treasury, but that subsequently, when the settlement or the claim was to be made, the treasury was empty. Similar suits to these, it is said, will be brought by other parties.
